

Charles Gutteridge

Charles Gutteridge has been the National Clinical Director for Informatics in England since January 2010. Throughout his health service career he has continued practising as a haematologist and has both clinical and laboratory interests in the specialty.

Charles has had a lifelong commitment to health service management and the transformation of personal health through research and innovation.

Prior to his appointment as National Clinical Director of Informatics, he was Medical Director of Barts and the London NHS Trust, a large university hospital serving the people of East London.